But this was no easy quarry. Drop-ping his huge grip and thumbing his The total sale nose, the young man sprinted northward. He was something of a sprinter, too, and the policeman had to hump himself to keep in his wake. As the fugitive widened his stride he began to shed things that clattered to the street.

The chase continued along seven blocks, to One Hundred and Sixth street, and the entire way was strewn with handsome plate, odds and ends of develop and a small bronze statuette jewelry and a small bronze statuette that slipped from the fugitive's gar-

At One Hundred and Sixth street the man turned westward and dashed for Central Park. The policeman had got his whistle out now and was splitting the early morning silence with its blasts. Pursued and pursuer cleared the park wall in single jumps and the race continued to the rim of the Har-lem Mere. There the fugitive shed a

The prisoner said he was Arthur Klein, twenty-six years old, a black smith, homeiess. The police say that for a beginner, he has made a starting record in housebreaking. He was taken to Police Headquarters to be measured, photographed and put on the third degree grill.

Before Inspector McCafferty, Klein said he had been living at a lodging house at One Hundred and Twenty-ninth street and Third avenue. He said that at 5 o'clock this morning, as he was walking up Madison avenue, he was accosted by three men, who carried satchels, and one of them told Klein to take one of them, When he refused, he said, he was threatened with a revolver, and he took one of the satchels. He did not explain how he had become separated from the trio. While Klein was being examined he was identified by Detective Hahn, who said he arrested him on a burglary charge June 30, 1905. Klein declared that a picture in the Rogues' Gallery under the name of William Armond was not of him.
